5. Abstract: Professor Eiko Yamamoto provides a graduate school special lecture for young leaders in healthcare administration and public health. Maternal mortality is a critical health indicator globally. Japan has also struggled with reproductive health issues, particularly to achieve the reduction of maternal mortality. As a result, recent statistics show that maternal mortality in Japan is among the lowest in a global context. Professor Yamamoto presents the trends of declining maternal mortality in Japan over the years and efforts made for the improvement of maternal health management through the process. Professor Yamamoto also shares research on reproductive health in selected Asian countries. This lecture will be delivered in English.
